void callable_thing() { function(); // ^^^^---when T is deduced as void, this line works } In my case, I'm trying to deduce T from a type (e.g. std::vector) that I'm constructing. I understand that decltype in that context must return void, as declared by the standard. The question is, what are the classes being lost, and how can I construct a T? A: According to the current draft of the C++0x standard, decltype((function())) yields void, by 5.3.3/1: When a decltype-specifier begins with a type-specifier-seq and is followed by a brace-or-equal-initializer-list ([dcl.mptr], [dcl.ref]), the type-specifier-seq shall immediately follow the declaration that was so modified. So the following line of code should work fine: function(); To get T working, you can use void_t: void_t callable_thing() { return function(); } Some rare super-hard ice forms as a result of the cooling of water droplets Below: Next story in Science Researchers at the U.S. Department of Energy's Ames Laboratory have made a water-ice substance called ice II that is only the second to be discovered after the original, which formed at 4,000 degrees Fahrenheit, or 2,200 degrees Celsius

The document is an extensive yet sparse biography, containing some fascinating tales, such as the date of his birth (as a premature infant, he was rushed to the hospital and found to be comatose). It also has plenty of eerily similar tidbits, including a dream of Swartz's in high school, which was to hack MIT's network while parked outside of Marvin Minsky's office. The document also contains the statement he made just before his suicide, in which he bemoans the overprosecution of computer-related issues. This is an important point to make, because prior to Swartz's death, the prosecution was not adequately providing any motivation for it's actions. They claimed that Swartz was seeking financial gain by placing copyrighted files on The Pirate Bay, which according to him was not true. The prosecution also brought up Swartz's alleged hacking of MIT's network, something he had no hand in whatsoever. Swartz's parents are quoted as saying that their son was trying to make the world better, and that in their opinion, he was more than justified in his actions. Swartz's father wrote, "While it is extremely painful, our family is at peace." and that "Aaron was a beautiful person, a brilliant guy.
