trans-Pacific X-ray emissions from magnetic reconnection in the magnetotail. We present a continuous 3-dimensional global model for the 3-dimensional temporal and spatial distribution of solar X-ray emission generated by magnetic reconnection in the magnetotail. The model covers a geomagnetic tail index range from 1 to 9, i.e., from the Earth's mesopause up to the magnetopause. In order to validate the model, we compare our results to measurements from the Advanced Technology Small Explorer during its geomagnetically trapped orbit (ATSA-07). Spatial and temporal variations of the X-ray flux, spectral hardness and the proton/electron distribution during the magnetotail substorm are included in the model. Reconnection takes place for negatively charged regions with respect to the current sheet and is driven by the so-called secondary reconnection occurring at the current sheet-magnetotail boundary. In order to reproduce the flux variation during the substorm

Antimicrobial usage in livestock production - drivers for trade in health-related antibiotics. Antibiotics are widely used for prevention and treatment of diseases in livestock production, which implies exposure of both animals and humans to antimicrobials, either directly (e.g., via manure) or indirectly (e.g., via contaminated milk). Although antibiotics offer the advantage of rapid and effective disease control, they may cause environmental contamination, may be associated with emerging resistance, and are generally considered by the public as problematic because of their contribution to an increased risk of human infections. Nevertheless, trade in antibiotics is a growing industry, and the extent of trade in antimicrobial resistant human pathogens in animals and animal products is largely unknown. In this article, we will discuss the key points on current knowledge of (1) the level and drivers of transmission of antimicrobial resistance in animals, and (2) the extent of trade of antimicrobial resistant human pathogens in animals and animal products.

An improved understanding of these issues is needed to effectively control antimicrobial resistance in livestock and thus to ensure sustainable improvements in the safety of food and the maintenance of quality of life.

Q: How to change the color of a Panel (JFrame) without using the paint() method? I'm starting to make a multi-player turn based game, and I would like to change the background color of the panel when a player clicks the button on the panel, and keep the panel's color when a different player clicks the button. (This is what I'm attempting, but it doesn't seem to be working.)
